Day of Action: October 23-24, 2013 Every two years the Internet Society organizes a Day of Action event in order to take a stand against anti-net neutrality measures in the United States of America. Last year this day of action was celebrated on October 23. What is important is that the day of action is organized by a private company, called USTelecom. It is quite possibly the worst company that attacks the freedom of the Internet. Internet freedom is not only about the freedom of Internet users in the United States, but also about the global net neutrality. With the sole purpose of making the Internet better, the Internet Society is providing more and more resources to help all Internet users stay safe and protected. Some of these resources include the Internet Safety Center, community Q&A days, and many more. On the global net neutrality day of action, the day of action is the culmination of two days of action events. The first event is the day before, October 22. On that day, the Internet Society has issued a call to action and issued a statement. The statement speaks to the United States federal officials in order to raise awareness of the importance of net neutrality and the importance of keeping the Internet open, available and free. The second event is the day of action itself. After the statement has been issued, and you want to get involved, you should start by joining the campaign. On that day, the Internet Society will issue its call for action. It is very important to be a part of the call for action to raise awareness around the topic. You can join the call for action here. The Internet Society will be providing more information about the day of action and the events that are happening on the two days of action itself. You should keep an eye on the Internet Society blog, and the Internet Society Facebook page in order
