Cisco Ip.Q: Redirecting with no content being sent after redirecting I'm trying to redirect a user to a certain page, but I want no content to be sent to the new page. I found out how to do this from Facebook's documentation, but I was doing this on PHP and I have started to program a framework in ASP.NET MVC now. The one I use is this: $response->clearHeaders(); $response->clearParameter('Location'); $response->clearParameter('Content-Length'); $response->clearParameter('Accept-Ranges'); $response->clearParameter('Connection'); $response->setStatus(302); $redirectUrl = explode('/', $_SERVER['REQUEST_URI']); $redirectUrl = str_replace('/', '', str_replace('///', '/', $redirectUrl)); Now, I'm trying to change that, so I can do the same thing, but with a the correct MVC method and not the PHP method of doing that. So, my try would look like this: Response.Redirect(new Uri("/redirect/")); And I know that it will send no content because the first line will clear all the headers. But I don't know how to not send anything to that new page. I need to redirect the user to a new page, but no content should go there. And I have no access to the new page. A: Response.Redirect(new Uri("/redirect/")) Response.Redirect sends a 302 response. You can easily change it to a different status code if you want. Response.RedirectStatus = new System.Net.HttpStatusCode() { 302 = true } By Cheryl Lu-Lien Tan KUALA LUMPUR (Reuters) - The United States is unlikely to make a military move against North Korea in response to Pyongyang's test of what it says was a hydrogen bomb, according to a Malaysian newspaper report on Monday, citing government sources. The Straits Times, citing government and military sources, said there were no signs of an imminent threat of a U.S. strike

Following the release of the ExoMars satellite launch vehicle, the European Space Agency (ESA) announced on Monday that it will proceed with the mission. "We have decided to make good on our commitments to send the ExoMars Trace Gas Orbiter to the surface of the Red Planet in 2018," said Didier Flahaut, ESA's Director of Science and Robotic Exploration. "We are on track to launch our new spaceship in the coming months, and we look forward to continuing our operations at Cape Canaveral." The ExoMars Trace Gas Orbiter is meant to verify the makeup of Mars' atmosphere, refine our understanding of atmospheric chemistry, and search for signs of life. It will arrive at Mars in 2018, when the planet is just nine months from its closest proximity to Earth. ESA notes that a Space Act Agreement is in place between NASA and ESA for the cooperative development of the mission. The program will use the launch vehicle that was previously known as Schiaparelli. "The European Space Agency and NASA will work together to integrate the spacecraft and the launch vehicle," said Chris Seamans, NASA's program director for the ExoMars mission. "This gives us the ability to deliver the complementary science payloads and take advantage of the incredible capabilities of both launch vehicles. We will share the data, expertise and experience learned from this integrated partnership." While the bulk of the mission will be underway in 2018, it will be necessary to install a lander on the Martian surface in 2016. The ExoMars Lander will carry an X-ray spectrometer that will use radiation to sample the planet's rocks. It will also carry a probe that will be used to study the planet's magnetic field. The lander and X-ray spectrometer will be placed in orbit around Mars. Mars Science Laboratory is a pair of probes that will be sent to the surface of the planet to search for signs of life. One of the main goals is to study the weather on Mars, which is far more severe than what people find on Earth. "ExoMars will be able to measure the composition of a sample of Mars' atmosphere," said ExoMars' principal investigator, Igor Kokoromenko, of the University of Cologne. "It will also give us information on the wind speed and direction on Mars, and examine the presence of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere."
