Currently known Hidden Achievements in BTD6.Mycobacterium tuberculosis appears to have a higher initial colonization, pulmonary infiltration and early induction of lung damage than the gram-negative bacteria Pseudomonas aeruginosa. We have demonstrated that recombinant human tumor necrosis factor (TNF) produces a rapid killing of M. tuberculosis in vitro and that 6 x 10(6) units of TNF induce massive, transient lung damage and can induce a lethal pneumonitis in immunocompetent rabbits. In contrast, we have found that a lethal dose of TNF in rabbits is considerably lower for P. aeruginosa. We propose to continue our studies of the mechanism by which human TNF is protective against M. tuberculosis and P. aeruginosa infection and to extend these studies to other mycobacteria and gram-negative bacteria. We will use the following approaches to assess the protective activity of TNF: (1) The mechanism of the protection will be studied in mice infected by intratracheal instillation of M. tuberculosis. We will investigate TNF-sensitive mechanisms of initial mycobacterial clearance, including increased macrophage uptake of bacteria, changes in the macrophage respiratory burst, and changes in circulating neutrophils. In addition, we will study the roles of interferon-gamma, nitric oxide, and defensins in modulating the bacterial clearance by alveolar macrophages. (2) The induction of lung damage will be examined in mice infected with M. tuberculosis by morphologic, histologic, and physiologic examination. We will assess the level of toxicity of TNF by investigating the induction of extravascular fluid accumulation, changes in lung permeability, and increase in pulmonary vascular pressure. (3) We will evaluate the role of TNF in the mechanisms of susceptibility of rabbits and guinea pigs to M. tuberculosis infection. A mouse model of disease will be used to evaluate the roles of TNF in susceptibility to infection. By comparing rabbit and guinea pig pulmonary responses to infection, we will try to determine the role of TNF in the pathogenesis of M. tuberculosis in the lung.Prognostic factors for penile skin metastasis in patients with prostate cancer.
