Scale is a very basic yet reliable software utility functioning as an architectural scaler, enabling you to convert real dimensions into their paper equivalents. The program is built and functions in 16-bits, so not all machines can support it. Scale is very easy to use, all you need to do is enter the dimensions of the site in meters and press 'Enter', then input the required scale and once again hit the 'Enter' key. Scale instantly calculates and displays the accurate result, providing you with the number of centimeters you need to draw on your paper. The application is very precise, offering multiple digit decimals for each calculation, so you can be sure your drawings will be as correct as possible. The tool is quite limited, being able to perform one operation and one alone, meaning it cannot do anything else aside from scaling meters into centimeters. You cannot even copy the results to clipboard and paste them in another window, nor can you save them to a file. As such, if you need to work further with these values, you will need to copy them by hand. Moreover, Scale does not keep a history of the previous calculations, meaning that every time you want to start anew, the other operations' results will be lost, so make sure to manually save each operation, if for instance, you want to make a comparison. To conclude, Scale is a small and useful application that has a very restricted functionality, but manages to perform its one task successfully and accurately every time, thus saving you valuable time and effort in the process. The present work evaluated the role of Fe, Mn, Cu, Zn, and Cd in the bioaccumulation of lead in the leafy shore crab Chionoecetes bairdi, one of the most important species in the Brazilian coast. In order to evaluate the role of metal bioaccumulation, levels of these elements were determined in the digestive gland and the hepatopancreas. The metal concentrations in C. bairdi from the Brazilian coast were compared with concentrations reported for other crustaceans and some marine organisms from different locations. The results indicated that lead bioaccumulation in C. bairdi was not related to the concentrations of these metals in the digestive gland and the hepatopancreas. Indeed, the concentrations of these metals in the digestive gland and hepatopancreas varied from low to very high, and the lowest concentration was observed for Pb. The concentration of Pb in the digestive gland and hepatopancreas of C. bairdi was lower than the Pb concentration reported for other crustaceans. It is noteworthy that the concentrations of Fe, Mn, and Zn were higher in the hepatopancreas than in the digestive gland. This could be due to the greater ability of this organ to accumulate metals. In contrast, the concentration of Cu in the digestive gland was higher than the concentration of Cu
