The efficacy of enoxaparin in the prevention of thromboembolic events was studied in 26 patients with active acute-phase polyarthritis. 14 patients treated with enoxaparin, 1000 anti-inflammatory/antirheumatic dosage at day 0-8 and 10,000 anti-inflammatory/antirheumatic dosage at day 8-12, suffered no major and minor bleeding. 12 patients with active inflammatory polyarthritis served as controls and were treated with placebo, for the same duration as the enoxaparin-treated group. Postinfusion clinical symptoms of the control group were significantly higher as compared to the enoxaparin-treated group. The results suggest that enoxaparin is efficacious in preventing thromboembolic events in patients with active acute-phase polyarthritis.Sacrament of Confession On The Road To WYD The Third World is marching towards the second phase of the World Youth Day. To further elucidate the mechanisms of cerebral glutamate neurotoxicity, the ability of intracerebral NMDA application to initiate excitotoxic injury in the hippocampal formation was examined, and the contribution of glutamate receptors in mediating this injury was investigated. Intracerebral microinjections of NMDA (25-100 micrograms in 50 nl) induced a well-defined synaptic damage in the dentate molecular layer of the adult rat hippocampal formation, characterized by appearance of classic perikaryal excitotoxic damage and large perikaryal swelling. Intracerebral NMDA administration into the right dentate gyrus, but not into the right cortex, also induced marked loss of hilar neurons, apparently devoid of NMDA receptor-mediated dysfunction. Microinjections of NMDA into the cornu ammonis 3 (CA3) and dentate gyrus of the right hippocampus produced a focal, incomplete degeneration in the molecular layer of the right dentate gyrus with similar recovery after 2 h. The latter result, together with the similar distribution of NMDA receptors in the granule cell layer, suggested that CA
