Introduction {#sec1-1} ===== The patients with arteriovenous (AV) fistula which supplies the liver are at a high risk of developing thrombosis and subsequent embolism. [1] The complications of AVF are mainly from the AV anastomosis itself and those of fistula, while the complications of AVF itself, such as obstruction, steal, or turbulence, should be treated during the fistula creation. Once the complication happened, it can be directly treated. That is why the evaluation of the fistula is very important in order to avoid the complications. [2] Advanced Sizing Imaging {#sec1-2} =====

===== The most important imaging for AVF are CTA and MRA. CTA is widely used for evaluation of vessel stenosis and thrombus. By comparison with CT angiography, MRA is effective for evaluation of collateral pathways and occlusion. It has been a long time since CTA and MRA are introduced for AVF evaluation. However, the technologies and the experiences of those two modalities have been developed. Nowadays, they can be used commonly for AVF evaluation [Figure 1] (#F1){ref-type="fig"}. Compared with CTA, MRA uses lower radiation dose and no risk of contrast-induced nephropathy. [A 26-year-old female with end-stage renal disease on hemodialysis and a history of abdominothoracic AVF for 2 years. Initial CTA and MRA show that the fistula starts from femoral artery and reaches a single vein in the upper segment of the liver. The right hepatic vein is quite tortuous and present many occlusions. No enhancement of intrahepatic portal vein can be found. The left hepatic vein is normal. In MRA, the superior mesenteric vein and inferior mesenteric vein are moderately tortuous with the thrombosis in the
