Previous to AutoLISP V.1.2, AutoCAD's APIs were accessed through the command line. This version included several changes to the command line environment that allow users to access the AutoCAD APIs through a web browser. AutoLISP is a general-purpose programming language that supports interaction with the AutoCAD software. It is the programming language used in the AutoCAD Editor, and to an extent, is the default language used to develop AutoCAD extensions. AutoLISP is based on LISP, but contains many features to allow extensions to be developed for AutoCAD. AutoLISP was developed by Image Systems, who, at the time, were owned by Tandem Computers. Image Systems, and thus AutoLISP, are now owned by Autodesk. The original version of AutoLISP is referred to as "Visual LISP". It includes the design of the user interface and several features to help program AutoCAD extensions. AutoLISP runs in two modes. In Visual LISP Mode, it is possible to open files in the editor. In this mode, it is possible to execute AutoLISP programs that can interact with AutoCAD. In the "Interactive" mode, which is the default mode, AutoLISP can be used to create new files, such as the AutoCAD program. It is also possible to execute AutoLISP programs that can interact with AutoCAD. LISP AutoLISP is based on the LISP programming language. This allows AutoLISP to interoperate with programs written in LISP. Visual LISP In Visual LISP Mode, it is possible to open files in the editor. It is possible to run AutoLISP programs that interact with AutoCAD. In Visual LISP mode, it is possible to open a drawing file using the Open command and view it in the editor. I'll admit it was kind of nice not having to worry about packing a bag, washing the hair and getting dressed for the club, then driving all over the city for bar hopping. Instead we all piled into the club car after the meeting was done, and had some great food and plenty of drinks before heading home to the wee ones.
