A list of some of the discoveries are:

- We know that the universe has dark matter. However, we have only detected dark matter indirectly, by the way it interacts with the regular matter in our system
- We know that the universe is expanding. We know we are far from the centre of the universe, i.e. it does not exist. It does exist, however the observed expansion of the universe is not only in space, but also in time.

We also know that the universe is not static: the expansion of the universe causes matter to leave our visible part of the universe, thus creating empty space, dark spaces. Like a balloon depreciates as time goes, the expansion of the universe leads to more and more dim, dark voids.

- Some missing free energy. Currently, physics believes that there should be more energy, described by so called vacuum energy, than we can observe. It is approximately 4, 509 million times more than the amount we can detect
- Electricity is not intrinsic but due to the movement of electrons, much like when you see the tennis ball spin on its way up, at the moment it is stationary, is actually rotating, we have the illusion of an intrinsic or permanent state of motion. Electricity has been reported to result from spin-related electron motions.
- Unusual behavior of electric conduct

Since John McCain has started his official campaign for US president, his positions on Barack Obama have been making headlines, especially his arrogant comment, "I know Barack Obama." A conservative political columnist, for example, said McCain was referring to a 13-year-old Barack Obama, who was attending a private, white, elitist school in Indonesia when McCain served as a naval officer in Indonesia. kine This interview is part of Hand Me Down, a weekly series in which we ask eight artists for advice on how they create their art, and each of their responses is placed into a neat little narrative, each one of which is exclusive to a different artist. You can read highlights from other interviews over on Instagram at @handmemytown or on SoundCloud at SMC_BookArt. The first interview, featuring Olivia Randall and Jane Banks, may be found here. Olivia Randall The Question: What is your relationship to your work? The Answer: I think my relationship to my work has to do with what I am trying to create. I try to make work that comes from each of me individually; I keep in mind what memories a place evokes for me, or what time of year it feels like here - what associations each image conveys. My work tends to be a response to what I find interesting and important in each moment, which is the way I live. It helps that I live here - my relationship to this city influences the images I make here. But then, it also helps that I don't make my primary living here, and that I don't live with my parents in Southern California - I spend my time here, then I want to bring the things I make here and show them far and wide. The Question: Do you feel like your body of work has progressed or changed over time? Is it more of a discovery you've found about certain ideas or how you want to express them or what you're pushing yourself to do? The Answer: I guess it's simply become more honest. I didn't want to limit myself - I wanted to find and cling to my story of myself and my body of work, and the ways that I deal with the world, and love, and sadness. Some pieces have been difficult to approach - some have come easier, others harder, some I've been more reluctant to fully commit to, some I've put off for far longer than I should have. The older pieces are the ones that offer the most promise, the ones that made me tell that story, partly because there's a greater sense of participation, and a greater commitment. I hate it when I'm not on the other side of a piece, or cannot completely see where it needs to go; it kills me. I'
