Next in the series of the Unified Communication System, I have been looking into another important feature of UC - that of Push To Talk. At the moment we do not see a truly successful implementation of this feature. We all know about 'push to talk' used in a business channel. Well, this is a different situation altogether as we are looking at the scenario where a p2p business channel is also used for a personal talk. In the two situations above, what I saw is that the P2P system with push to talk can get bloated. The reason for this is the presence of two independent 'systems' that communicate over the internet. I believe that this is possible to implement to reduce the bloat. Since this is not possible as part of the current SIP stack, the Linux server approach can be a right fit. This blog covers the requirements of the Linux server that would be making a connection to a user's device through a web interface on the device. The reason for such a configuration is, we are making sure that a user with a web interface is comfortable to use. I believe this is the most important requirement for any UC implementation.
