water-resistant sound insulator and a method of manufacturing the same. When there is a static electricity that is caused by a change in electrical potential of a human body, a step-up circuit or the like, a spark may be caused between a high potential metal and a low potential metal, and may ignite an inflammable material. Such a phenomenon is often caused in a washing machine, a drying machine and the like. To suppress the spark, various water-resistant sound insulators each constructed so that there is a space inside or outside a signal circuit have been proposed. For example, a sound insulator having a sealing layer made of resin and a conductive layer provided on the surface of the sealing layer is proposed (see JP Patent Document 1). The sealing layer contains a moisture water-proof
