The most sensitive method for the diagnosis of brain tumours is computed tomography. Magnetic resonance imaging is usually restricted to the assessment of adjacent and involved tissue. To visualise abnormalities in an intact brain, often the only method available is the one of small animal imaging with nuclear medicine. However, the use of this method is limited to probes for positron emission tomography. To identify tumours on the basis of metabolic changes, an alternative method is the use of probe substances, such as [18F]-fluorodeoxyglucose and 1-[11C]aminopyrrolidine. These substances are transported from blood to brain tissue at different rates depending on the metabolic rate of the tumour cells. Therefore, the accumulation rate of the positron emitter is different between tumours and normal tissue. By introducing [18F]fluorodeoxyglucose or 1-[11C]aminopyrrolidine, the metabolic activity of tumour tissue can be imaged. The present review discusses the basic principles of cerebral metabolic changes in brain tumours. Special attention is given to the use of these tracers in the diagnosis of intracranial tumours. In addition, the diagnostic potential of [18F]fluorodeoxyglucose and 1-[11C]aminopyrrolidine in the evaluation of brain tumours and their metastases is discussed.Error analysis on electron transfer with
