"The mood I'm in, I can't live without it." This is the declaration of an ordinary person on the street. The sad smile. The tension in the eyes. The deep emotion that lies beyond the surface of the skin. A slight tinge of nostalgia. In its black and white magical world, humanity struggles with a bewitching existence. A fundamental act of draining the power of others is a basic human experience. A source of happiness. A language to be understood. A justification for life. Wouldn't it be great if the existence beyond the mysterious abyss was just like this? Having fought this place for so long, humanity came to the conclusion that the three lands were connected to each other. It gave rise to the belief that this Abyss is a false world that should be abandoned to the outside. Neutrophils are capable of endothelial transmigration in the absence of macrophage involvement. We investigated whether or not human neutrophils can migrate into microvascular endothelium in the absence of macrophages, using human umbilical vein endothelial cell monolayers in the presence of recombinant human tumor necrosis factor alpha (TNF alpha) or lipopolysaccharide (LPS). TNF alpha induced neutrophil transendothelial migration (P less than 0.001) in a dose-dependent manner at concentrations up to 1,000 U/ml; this migration was associated with L-selectin shedding (P less than 0.001) and adherence to lymphocytes (P less than 0.01). LPS also stimulated neutrophil transmigration in a dose-dependent manner (P less than 0.001). This effect was associated with L-selectin shedding (P less than 0.001) and adherence (P less than 0.05). In the presence of the anti-TNF alpha R1/R2 monoclonal antibody (mAb) (CAT143), TNF alpha-stimulated neutrophil migration was inhibited by up to 70% (P less than 0.001) in a dose-dependent manner (1.0-10.0 micrograms/ml). The mAb was also effective against TNF alpha-stimulated neutrophil adherence. In contrast to R1/R2, in which only L-selectin was shed, R3, which inhibits both L-selectin shedding and adhesion molecule expression, completely suppressed TNF alpha-stimulated neutrophil transmigration. R3 had no effect on neutrophil migration. LPS-stimulated neutrophil migration was also blocked by R3. Adhesion between neutrophils and endothelial cells was not detectable under the conditions of the assay. Our results demonstrate that in addition
