Phosphatidylinositol 3-kinase and Akt/PKB signaling as a potential therapeutic target in breast cancer. Phosphatidylinositol 3-kinase (PI3K) and Akt/PKB are central kinases in the phosphatidylinositol 3-kinase signaling pathway and are activated in many tumors. To target PI3K and

Akt/PKB in cancer, we overexpressed the downstream regulator, p85/p110, of the PI3K/Akt signaling pathway and a dominant negative mutant form of Akt/PKB in MDA-MB-231 human breast cancer cells. Overexpression of p85/p110 activated Akt/PKB and stimulated cell growth, whereas expression of the dominant negative mutant form of Akt/PKB suppressed cell growth and proliferation. In addition, the expression of the dominant negative mutant form of Akt/PKB overcame the effect of PI3K and reduced cell viability and anchorage-independent growth. Furthermore, the expression of the dominant negative mutant form of Akt/PKB reversed the antiapoptotic effect of PI3K on MDA-MB-231 cells. These results suggest that PI3K is a potential therapeutic target in breast cancer.

Q: Resolving a conflict between MIT-style copyright and clause starting with the work's year-of-publishing clause Let's say that the author of a license is Henry VIII. It's a longstanding tradition in British and US law that a person whose first and last name of the author of the work, is not allowed to hold any copyright. Nor is a corporation that does not hold the right to possess the copyright, at least under British and US law. The author whose name is the first word of the license can hold the copyright (and to interpret that author's intentions, we must assume that they wanted their copyright to stand), but the rest of us, not being natural persons, don't. What is Henry VIII's solution to this problem? It seems to me that his best option is to insert a clause into the license stating the following: YEAR OF PUB (copyright/attribution) CLAUSE The author(s) of this work hereby grant a perpetual, worldwide, non-exclusive copyright license to anyone
