The AP exam cannot be imagined without the "know-nothing" theory of knowledge. In fact, for so many years, the average practicing paralegal had almost no exposure to legal research, analysis, judgment and writing skills. At best, they knew the ins-and-outs of filing and managing cases. One reason is that the American Bar Association adopted the "know-nothing" theory of knowledge in 1972. The problem is that the legal community has no sustained response to this problem until recently. Most law firms are always learning and searching for the new and improve procedures. One reason to know more about the "know-nothing" theory of knowledge and its impact to the law and paralegal profession is because a lack of professionalism and knowledge in such an important discipline has been holding back the advancement of paralegal education. While we continue to seek answers to this problem, law professors and paralegals from the New Jersey Chapter of the National Paralegal Association do have answers. After reading this article you will learn what the know-nothing theory of knowledge is and why it plays an important role in the professional practice of paralegal. So, what is know-nothing theory? It is the idea that all knowledge starts with a blank slate—without any information. The know-nothing theory was first introduced by George Herbert Mead in the 1920s to describe the process of learning in children and students. Mead was a student of Charles Sanders Peirce and he adopted the idea from Peirce. The Peirce's theory was: "It is impossible to produce any new thought without already having some fixed body of ideas as a basis." This theory is also known as the "blank slate" theory.

Because of this theory, the early works of Sigmund Freud were believed to be more accurate.

The know-nothing theory is believed to be as inappropriate to the United States as "conspiracy theory" is. Simply put, the know-nothing theory is an absolutely bad theory. So, how has the know-nothing theory played an important role in paralegal? It has kept the American legal community from advancing. The Association of Certified Paralegals recognized that traditional paralegal education does not provide students enough practical experience with law and law-related subjects. This problem has existed for many years and is one of the reasons paralegals have not advanced. In fact,
