prevented and treated by several natural anti-cancer drugs, but the molecular mechanisms underlying their therapeutic effects are not well understood. Ginsenoside-Rb1 (GRb1) is reported to inhibit cancer growth and metastasis. However, whether GRb1 inhibits the motility of cancer cells has not been reported. In this study, we determined the effects of GRb1 on cancer cell migration and invasion using a wound-healing assay and a Matrigel-coated membrane. GRb1 strongly inhibited the motility of several human cancer cell lines. GRb1 inhibited the activation of Ras/Raf/ERK1/2 MAPK and Akt signaling cascades in cancer cells.

Further, GRb1 inhibited the activation of epidermal growth factor receptor (EGFR) but not the phosphorylation of EGFR-related signaling molecules. Moreover, GRb1 suppressed the expression of matrix metalloproteinases-2 (MMP-2) and matrix metalloproteinases-9 (MMP-9). GRb1 suppressed the EGF-induced activation of ERK1/2 MAPK and Akt, but not the phosphorylation of EGFR-related signaling molecules. Finally, in a nude mouse xenograft model, intravenous injection of GRb1 significantly suppressed lung metastasis of HT29 and Colo-205 human colorectal cancer cells. These results show that GRb1 inhibits cancer cell migration and invasion in vitro and in vivo by inactivating EGFR. Shop By Design By By By Todd Glaser May 11, 2008
