DISCUSSION {#omx059s10} ===== In this study of children with newly diagnosed cancer, global cognitive impairment assessed using DAWBA was observed in 7% of children who received chemotherapy. Cognitive impairments persisted for 1 year after treatment completion, and children receiving chemotherapy were at least twice as likely to have a mild cognitive impairment than those who did not receive chemotherapy. We found no evidence that chemotherapy was associated with increased risk of learning difficulties (i.e. non-verbal learning disabilities). This is the first study to report on the association between chemotherapy and cognitive impairments in children with cancer. In this study, children with high cognitive impairment scores at diagnosis were not more likely to develop cognitive impairment during treatment than children with low cognitive impairment scores. However, the small number of children with cognitive impairment with chemotherapy exposure (16.7%) means that no conclusions can be made about whether chemotherapy was associated with increased risk of cognitive impairment. However, children with a high cognitive impairment score at diagnosis were more likely to develop cognitive impairment during the year following treatment completion than children with a low cognitive impairment score. This association remained significant, after controlling for other factors that may impact on cognitive impairment, including young age, treatment dose and/or duration and performance status at diagnosis. The cognitive impairments seen in this study are similar to those seen in the general paediatric population \[[@omx059C20]\]. The rates of learning disabilities among children with cancer are also similar to the general population \[[@omx059C21]\]. The children in this study were not recruited at an early stage of their treatment, which may limit their ability to use cognitive functioning as a marker of future outcomes
