Chlamydomonas reinhardi has a number of unique characteristics. Among these are a complex flagellar structure, a free-living existence at all seasons, possessing two flagellar chromosomes and having a short generation time. Observations made in this laboratory on the flagellum of C. reinhardi are presented. The ultrastructure of the flagellum, as well as that of the basal body, is described. The flagellar membrane is composed of two distinct layers, the outer one being made up of the discretely arranged fibrils, the inner one consisting of the continuous electron-dense material. The width of the outer, or supramembranous, layer is about 1.4 nm while that of the inner one is 3-4 nm. The flagellar basal body is formed by two subunits which are termed the proximal and distal bodies. The proximal body is separated by a gap into a main and an accessory structure. The proximal body is further divided by a straight, narrow groove into a small and a large sector. The results of cytochemical and enzyme studies on the microtubular structures of the proximal body of the flagellum and basal body of C. reinhardi are also reported.. In the event that a breach has occurred, it is best to seek advice.
