To

explore the time-dependent pattern of non-invasive features associated with metabolic syndrome (MetS) and the longitudinal change in such changes induced by a lifestyle intervention. Observational study with follow-up. Hypertensive outpatients (n=151, ages 35-75 years) were recruited at baseline.

Lifestyle intervention (counseling sessions at baseline, 2, 6, and 12 months) was performed. Clinic blood pressure was taken. Waist circumference (WC) was measured twice. C-reactive protein (CRP), homeostasis model assessment for insulin resistance (HOMA-IR), and tissue Doppler-derived parameters of left ventricular (LV) diastolic function (e', Em/A, Em) were measured at baseline and after intervention. HOMA-IR, CRP, and Em significantly decreased and e' and Em/A significantly increased during the 12-month intervention. However, the time-dependent change in WC and HOMA-IR revealed a plateau after 6 months. The increment in e' was greater in subjects with MetS compared with non-MetS subjects at 6 months (3.1±2.
