PlaySurvey Report The GOP appears likely to take over the House of Representatives for the first time in eight years. Will it finally push through conservative legislation to offset any modest spending cuts after this year? In a series of leaks that provided the initial basis for the new policy, John Boehner appears to be hinting that there will be very little. The GOP is considering a new policy to make sure that the House's annual "cuts" to the discretionary spending budget remain small this year and in 2015, according to a draft leaked to Politico. The policy may also bar House members from pushing their own partisan bills that they want to see enacted, to help ensure that no member can block successful House-Senate compromise. One bill in the queue to be included in the policy could be a little-noticed omnibus spending bill that was passed by the House last week. The bill contained a significant cut to discretionary spending of about 6 percent, much smaller than the 12 percent sought by the conservative House leadership. But the growing policy uncertainty appears to be the result of more specific leaks that were the subject of discussions in Boehner's closed-door meetings on the House floor during the five-day government shutdown. While some congressional offices confirmed the details, these leaks may have resulted in the leaking of documents that were part of the discussions, rather than the result of an actual commitment to the new policy. There is little public support for such a policy among conservatives. But it is certainly an interesting new dimension of the struggle to work out a compromise on the federal budget. The details of this strategy are now available in the draft obtained by Politico. According to the draft, the policy could bar members from using their "revolving door privileges" to get around the traditional rules requiring that House members vote on spending bills - meaning they cannot force a vote on bills they want to see enacted. It also bars Democrats from forcing votes on their own bills. In addition, the rules could change so that any legislation that is not agreed to by both chambers would not be printed, and could instead be included only in the House or Senate rules
