Proximal migration of mandibular implants is a relatively common complication, and may present radiographically as perimplant bone loss, change of the position of the implant in relation to the crest of the mandible, or horizontal displacement of the implant. No single parameter can be used to identify reliably the cause of proximal migration. The use of a quantitative method, which is based on the relation between bone loss and horizontal implant migration, overcomes this problem. The aim of the present study was to assess the degree and pattern of proximal implant mobility in patients in the South-East Region of the United Kingdom. A total of 48 patients had both radiographs of the mandible and implants for implant treatment of the same jaw. The standard panoramic radiograph was taken for each implant, and a profile view was taken for the control, the implant position being recorded. Radiographs were taken at a mean of 14.4 months after placing the implant. Measurements were made digitally in the posteroanterior and lateral views. The bone loss between implants was calculated and the relation between bone loss and horizontal implant migration for individual implants evaluated. Half of the implants were found to be mobile. A high proportion of implants were mobile in the molar region, although a proportion of the implant did not lose any bone on the mesial aspect. There is a clear demand for quality control programs to identify and prevent the development of proximal implant migration, as this is common and is expensive in a patient population who cannot be easily identified as being at risk. on the 29 patients that had worsened radiologically, but it was not statistically significant. Therefore, this study could not demonstrate any advantage to pharmacological prophylaxis. However, we think that peri-implantitis might be more frequent d0c515b9f4
