Portable computer systems, such as laptop computers, have become very popular for both personal and commercial use. These portable computer systems are generally used in a limited environment such as inside an automobile, or in a fixed environment such as an office. In these environments, portable computer systems may encounter physical shock and vibration, and these forces may adversely affect the components of the portable computer system. For instance, in a portable computer system, an integrated circuit package (IC package) containing circuitry and hardware may physically contact a support panel to which the IC package is attached. If the IC package is slightly misaligned with the support panel, the IC package may collide with the support panel as the IC package is inserted into the support panel, further damaging the IC package. For instance, the IC package may be inserted into the support panel at an angle, and the IC package may tilt in response to the forces applied to the IC package when the IC package is brought into alignment with the support panel. As a result, the IC package may impact

I have an Oracle 12C Database which is stored in an Oracle 12C Virtual Datastore. In this instance I have one Oracle Master, and one Oracle Slave. I want to create a volume for this server, but it says there is no data for the database in that volume. How can I attach the volume with the database so I can access the data? A: Short answer: It does not work like it worked with Virtualbox (as stated in the comments). Long answer: Docker is by default using a bunch of disk mount points to make it possible for containers to reuse shared block devices (volumes). In short: You can't connect
