I have to check what the problem is, because I'm not getting an error message when my code segfaults. A: The manpage of core gives you full details. For GCC, it's set by the command line argument -g - see man core or the compiler manual. The default is off, and you need at least -g to get the generated core dump. Q: Highly optimized GC I want to speed up running of my web application, and I want my jvm to collect garbage as fast as possible. I have gathered the following configuration: Xmx (max memory) is set to the maximum my machine can support (12GB), which is fine. UseG1GC flag in my VM options. -XX:+UseConcMarkSweepGC parameter -XX:+CMSMinHeapFreeRatio=80 -XX:+CMSMaxHeapFreeRatio=80 But the problem is that my jvm still takes long time to end garbage collection, even with those configuration. If I try running my test application, it takes 20-25 minutes to end. Is my configuration of the jvm appropriate for my target machine (an Intel Macbook Pro), so as to optimize garbage collection on the target machine? A: See the Garbage Collector Tuning guide from Oracle. These are the default settings on new JVMs. In your case, I'd e79caf774b
