Does the classification of multiple sclerosis as a neurodegenerative or autoimmune condition influence the prognosis for patients? To test the prognostic effect of a disease-related classification system of multiple sclerosis (MS) and to determine factors that may influence prognosis of MS patients. Data on MS patients diagnosed between 1991 and 2002 were included. Relapse-free survival (RFS) and accumulation of disability were calculated. In addition to the time-dependent variables, age at MS onset, gender and disease duration at baseline, the study included time-independent risk factors for a poor prognosis. We studied 657 patients, of whom 105 patients (16%) showed a poor prognosis. The time-dependent variables separated all patients into three subgroups with significantly different RFS. Patients in group 1 with a short time between diagnosis and onset of disease activity had the shortest RFS. RFS increased if initial symptoms occurred with high disease activity, polysymptoms were present at time of diagnosis and disease duration increased. Age was a time-independent risk factor for a poor prognosis. Gender, initial symptoms, disease activity at diagnosis, polysymptoms, and disease duration were the most significant risk factors for a poor prognosis. For the first time, we propose a classification system for MS in which disease characteristics are analyzed and used to support treatment decisions. We recommend investigating, and potentially improving, prognosis in new disease-modifying therapies. U.S. Senator McCain, the 80 year old war mongering imperialist who held the highest office for 8 years under Bush Junior, and then in 2008 ran for president against the 44 year old Mr. Obama, is now calling for a war with Iran. "It's not a question of whether we should take action. It's when we should take action," said McCain. McCain, who was shot down in the Korean conflict at the age of a 20 year old, claims he is suffering from a conflict with his Vietnam-era comrades. "I am the Democratic Republican," said McCain. "I'm a hawk. They're war-weary. What do I have
