it should be an “associate” column with a BIT column being the value in each row. Associative Hierarchical TSQL Here is one of the first things I found when searching for this topic: Microsoft. Note the example in the following page that shows the following: This is an example of what I was looking for, and it also shows the following: There are several other ways of accomplishing hierarchical results in TSQL but, from what I have seen, the bit column is the most common. For this example, we will start with a simple example, and then expand on how one would apply this to an actual sales report. The following is a basic hierarchical construct, or, in other words, a table with three columns for three levels of hierarchy. One of the things that is noteworthy is that the values in the hierarchy are not the same in all three columns. For example, Row 1 is the parent to Row 2, yet Row 1 is not the parent of Row 3 (and Row 2 is not Row 3’s parent, either). This is because the parent and the children tables have no relationship; they simply have a common column to be able to access the data. It is the same situation as the case where you have a great uncle and two nephews and the family relations get complicated because each of them has a parent
