The effect of these drugs on resting tension of the left ventricular posterior wall of the porcine heart was studied in vitro and compared with their ability to inhibit the action potential shortening and the spontaneous release of noradrenaline.

Prostacyclin had no effect on the two actions, whereas diltiazem significantly reduced the action potential shortening and the spontaneous release of noradrenaline. However, verapamil significantly decreased the action potential shortening only. These results demonstrate that, in contrast to its ability to inhibit the action potential shortening and the spontaneous release of noradrenaline, prostacyclin does not inhibit these phenomena. The different effects of diltiazem and verapamil on the two actions might therefore be explained by differences in their ability to act on different calcium channels."Beyond God" Rated NR Immediate and somber, as if from an American refugee camp, this low-rent movie describes
