Identification of a ceramide C-mannosyltransferase in Saccharomyces cerevisiae. Ceramide C-mannosyltransferase was identified in Saccharomyces cerevisiae. This enzyme catalyzes the first step in the biosynthetic pathway for the mannosylation of ceramide. The enzyme is encoded by the POT1 gene. The POT1 gene was cloned by complementation of a pmyo-2 mutant. The gene is highly homologous to the POT1A and POT1B genes of Saccharomyces cerevisiae and codes for ceramide C-mannosyltransferase. The enzymatic properties of the enzyme were identical to those of the POT1B protein. The POT1 gene was disrupted by gene replacement and the wild-type strain and the mutant were constructed. In the mutant, the total ceramide content in the cell wall was reduced by about 35%. The resulting mutant strain does not grow when grown on surfaces coated with ceramide. Here's what you do: Get a local copy of EasyDiag and run it twice, once to get that part number, and again to find the process Id associated with the part number. If it doesn't work, just run it a third time. It should report a new process ID. If it doesn't, you've got a bum OEM part. If it does, then you've got a bad process ID. If you still don't have the process ID, then you have some other problem. In all 3 cases, you've gotta call your OEM. The only explanation I can think of is that the OEM (that is to say, whoever manufactured your car for the original owner) has changed something they shouldn't have, but I can't even imagine what such a thing might be. I'm assuming the problem is more in the data-collecting side of the process than in the data-extracting side. So, it'd be quite odd if your car wasn't collecting this information, and it's doing it, but that data extraction part isn't working. It would also be odd if it was collecting the data and just not asking for it to be extracted when it's run by another vehicle. So, you'd have to check your diagnostic data collection settings to make sure that's not the case, but I doubt that would do it. One thing else to do would be to go get a replacement part. If it doesn't have the information you need, then replacing it is a last-ditch effort. If it does, then you have it, and you have a valid way to get your car's behaviour recorded.
