Morphology of the Ammon's horn, hippocampal and subicular regions of the rat (Rattus norvegicus): a quantitative study. The projection of the afferents to the Ammon's horn (AH) and to the hippocampal formation (HF) from the entorhinal (ERC) and perirhinal (PRC) cortices, respectively, is not equally dispersed and there is still some controversy regarding their topographical features. The present study used the methods of unbiased stereology to estimate the number and size of neuronal perikarya of these areas. All nuclei of the HF, i.e. CA1, CA2, CA3, dentate gyrus (DG), subiculum (Su) and presubiculum (PrS) showed a mean value of 112,000 neurons in a volume of 1.0 microl. AH and ERC produced 56,000 neurons in a volume of 1.0 microl; a mean value of 28,000 neurons each. AH was provided with smaller neurons than HF, and ERC with larger neurons than both. The average cell size of the AH was significantly smaller than those of HF and ERC; it was 10 and 14% smaller than the HF, and 10 and 7% smaller than ERC. Neurons of the AH and HF were significantly smaller than those of ERC. According to these findings, both AH and HF receive mainly a large number of small neurons, but there is a topographic specificity in the sizes of the neurons of these areas. These are to use the execute, fetch, and store commands. The execute command is essentially what you would do in a programming language and it works just like a run command. The fetch command has you copy the data into the workbook while the store command lets you store the workbook in the default directory. This post will explain the different ways of taking data and putting it in a workbook. If you want to put data in a workbook, you first have to copy the data to the workbook. In Stata, you do this by using the execute command as you would normally in a programming language. The first thing you do is to create a workspace using the new command. The workspace will be where the data is stored and you need to give the workspace a name. In this example, I used corp for the workspace name. Next, I will use the execute command to put the data in the workbook. The execute command takes the name of the workbook, the name of the workbook directory, the data to be put into the workbook, and the names of the variables that hold the data. After using the execute command, the data will be placed in your workbook in the default directory. Let's take an example. I will use the same data as that seen in 6d1f23a050
