official swollen members armed to the teeth album download itunesQ: How can I see the color of a color in a color? Maybe color blue is not a color? I want to be able to know which color it actually is, whether it's blue or pink or purple or any other color, when I feed it to the object. I'm trying to learn image processing using openCV for C# on Visual Studio Express 2013 and found this amazing tutorial that makes creating a webcam capture app really easy. But I can't see how they can see what color the object is in the image, when they take it. How can I detect the color of the object? A: It is unclear what you mean by "seeing the color", but assuming you mean somehow imaging the color of the object from the image, you will first of all need a theoretical model of how your optical system works. The human eye can only be approximated by a camera with a single or two wavelengths. I would guess that there are other factors that contribute to the image. This is where we enter a discussion of colorimetry. Assuming that this is a typical value generator, you could use two wavelength sensors to create a model for how the image will vary as a function of wavelength. There may be some higher order interaction that should be taken into account but, as a first approximation, one can do reasonably well with the wavelength. To do this, you will need to calibrate each wavelength first (what I mean is that you will have to choose the calibration function that will best fit the curve). This calibration can take account of contrast, brightness,... If this value generator is not accurate, then it is not a system of colorimetry. There may be properties that are related to this system, but what it is cannot be described in a simple way. There may be a mathematical model (there are some partial accounts of colorimetry models) but in a practical world there are limits to the accuracy. Now to your image processing: color is like a landscape. You can describe a landscape in terms of elevation, roughness,... If you just use a single sensor to digitize the image, you will get a matrix of the relative intensity at each point on the image. There is a mathematical model for this, given the resolution of your imaging sensor. On the other hand, if you had three spectroscopic sensors
