Natural killer (NK) cells are a subset of innate immune cells of the lymphoid system equipped with surface receptors that kill target cells in an MHC class I-unrestricted manner. Studies in mice have shown that NK cells can kill HIV-infected cells. NK cell recognition of HIV-infected cells appears to be mediated by receptors that have been identified with the CD8 co-receptor and with Ly49 receptor family members. In this study, we investigated the function of NK cells during chronic infection of mice with HIV-1. We show that NK cells can limit the impact of the antiviral CD8 T cell response in mice chronically infected with HIV-1, and that this NK effect is mediated by Ly49C, an NK inhibitory receptor. This result supports a functional interaction between CD8 T cells and NK cells in chronic infection.Tools of the IT trade An MIT biologist has made a computer program that helps biologists speed up the tedious gene sequencing process. Todd Goldstein, a postdoctoral research fellow at MIT and head of the department’s Systems Biology and Bioengineering group, programmed OpenSourcealgorithm, which he created with several of his graduate students. Compared to the automated methods used in the past, this software yields sequence data within 24 hours for around $1,000, the costs of which are likely to drop, Goldstein says. OpenSourcealgorithm uses a small amount of computer memory and processor time. Since the introduction of the 5’-3’ polymerase chain reaction 6d1f23a050
