We would also love to help you. Public education in the United States is organized by local school districts at the state and local levels. Except in exceptional circumstances, parents have no legal right to decide the kind of education that their children are taught. The federal role in education is generally limited to enforcing the Constitution and complying with certain federal laws such as the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act, and the No Child Left Behind Act. Local control in the United States, there is no compulsory statewide public education system in the United States. The model of education is much more decentralized than in Europe. Each state has the authority to set policy regarding education at the state level, and they are allowed to spend their own money on public education. Consequently, all public schools in the United States are local schools. The level of control a state exercises is highly dependent on the philosophy and goals of its government. Historically, the United States was divided into 39 colonial and territorial educational systems. During the 19th century and early 20th century, smaller states (such as Arizona, Hawaii, and Alaska) and some territories (such as Guam) established their own educational systems. However, as large industrial cities spread throughout the nation, the populations of rural areas increased. As a result, the small, new educational systems merged into a system of public education in the United States, with some older systems (such as the Maryland system) continuing to operate. School districts are still commonly called "administrative units" within the United States, as they were called in colonial and territorial times. States have various tax funding models for schools and public schools have also been referred to as "local schools" within the United States. The value of public education in the United States is a prominent issue in the United States. The United States is one of only three developed nations (along with Japan and Germany) that do not guarantee its citizens basic education. History Colonial and territorial education Migration and the settlement of the New World led to a series of educational and educational systems throughout the New World. In colonial times, the British educational system largely replaced the one that had been in operation in Europe.
