kerosene produced from biomass is derived from biomass feedstocks such as wood, crop residue, algae, and other organic waste streams. feedstocks can be produced locally or transported long distances from areas of agricultural and forestry. the feedstocks are often collected and transported to a processing facility, where the feedstock is processed and converted into a final form such as pellets or powder. the feedstocks for kerosene production are often more valuable when they are in a liquid form. the production of kerosene from biomass is often compared with that of ethanol, which is often a more valuable product when it is in a liquid state. in addition, many consumers of kerosene prefer to use it as a fuel for lamps. catalytic cracking is typically performed in the presence of a catalyst in a reactor. the catalyst is typically a mixture of clay minerals and zeolites (see figure 2.5). [3] in the process, steam is mixed with the feedstock material, which is then heated and brought to the reaction temperature in the presence of the catalyst. this mixture is then crushed and ground, and the resulting material is packed in a reactor. the catalysts are either added to the reactor in the form of pellets or as a slurry. the mixture is then heated to a high temperature, which causes the molecules to break apart. these molecules are then cracked into smaller molecules, and as the process continues, aromatics are formed. the aromatics are heated until they reach the boiling point of the mixture, and they start to separate from the remaining molecules. the mixture is then cooled and the lighter fractions (i.e., gasoline) and heavier fractions (i., kerosene) are separated.
