webauthn is primarily targeted at public and intranet-based deployments, where password autofill is widely available and a site or user can revoke a cryptotoken or make it time-limited to prevent misuse of the cryptotoken by for example a bot or a human attacker that got compromised. however, it is also envisaged that webauthn might be deployed in scenarios where a device is not a computer (a.k.a. serverless ), and password autofill is not available. in such scenarios, it would be valuable if revoked certificates could be made invalid if compromised even in scenarios where password autofill is not available. this protocol is a generic mechanism for transferring asymmetric authentication information such as certificates and credentials to the authenticator. it should be noted that the transfer of authentication information rather than the authentication information. for instance, the use of this protocol is orthogonal to the use of some other protocol for transferring authentication information. { "*" : value-range [ value-range1, value-range2 ], "*" -fallback": value-range [ value-range1, value-range2 ] } result, "*" -fallback-config": value .. } each "*" is replaced by the corresponding authentication factor, where the value is the client authentication data associated with the corresponding factor. the collectedclientdata transfers a bytestring of zero-length or a bytestring containing json. if a non-zero-length bytestring is transferred then it must be base64url encoded.
