I have to wonder if a more pedantic user would notice any significant difference in image quality if anything other than the use of Adobe Photoshop Elements as a tool for a hobbyist. The files are created in the same image format, ready for output to a desktop printer. Otherwise, there are only a few differences in the way that Photoshop Elements works: The effects you have in the “Enhance” section of the “Adjustment Layers” dialog (and of editing an image in a layer) are different, but you can get the same results by using Photoshop. Lightroom does similar things, and it’s likely all three programs are largely compatible. The only difference I’ve noted between Lightroom 5 and Photoshop Elements is that Photoshop Elements’ Layers panel seems better organized. If you’re not familiar with Live Blend, this video shows a simple example of how live blending works, and demonstrates how it speeds up adjustment blending effects. Live Blend utilizes the powerful perceptual blending technology in Photoshop CC that is found in Adobe Camera RAW (ACR) and Adobe Photoshop, and what really sets this approach apart is let’s say, you choose several color adjustment layers to blend. In those layers, you can modify the content - add, delete, or move content to create a new result. You do this by painting directly over the content - as opposed to the traditional way of using adjustment layers and layered masks. This ability to “edit” the content at the pixel level helps to give images a more palatable, polished look.
