The Law School Admission Test is a standardized test, given at universities and other institutions of higher learning in several different countries, including Canada and USA. The LSAT exam is a four-hour test, composed of six sections. Each section has 60 multiple-choice questions, among which 10 are essay questions. This is the fundamental difference between the LSAT and the SAT. The former is a standardized test that anyone, irrespective of their level of education or prior knowledge, can take. This is the very reason why the LSAT is considered a more efficient means of admission to law school than the SAT, which is normally taken by students whose ultimate goal is to get into a top college. The LSAT is also claimed to be more difficult than the SAT. What this means is that it tests more aspects of your personality than the latter, as well as its ability to lead you to a successful career. In many cases, the LSAT is the decisive factor that helps you get into a given law school.
