From a national perspective, the United States as a whole is starting to dig out of the debris of the recession, but for many low- and moderate-income Americans, our recovery has yet to begin. In July 2009, poverty reached a 45 year high and while the number of people in poverty nationwide has since receded back below its peak, the recessions "thickening" effect on the poor continued to increase poverty nationwide, from 39 million in December 2007 to 43.2 million in December 2011. Between December 2011 and December 2012 the number of Americans living in poverty declined to 43.5 million, but the recession's "thickening" effect on poverty continued and from December 2012 to December 2013, poverty rose back to 43.7 million. But here in Texas poverty remains stubbornly high and is particularly acute in the Southwest. In December 2012, the Southwest region was home to 20.3 percent of the poor, more than any other region. Roughly a fifth of Texans - 22 percent - were poor. South and North Central Texas combined to have the second highest rate at 19.2 percent. The West Texas region followed with 15.8 percent of its population poor. But Texas has also experienced an increase in poverty even during the midst of its economic recovery, with a remarkable rise in the poverty rate from 8.6 percent in July 2009 to 11 percent in December 2012. There were over 1 million Texans living in poverty in December 2012, a rate that was 4 points higher than the national rate. Poverty rates for both the Northeast and Midwest are higher than the national average, but they have remained relatively stable in the Northeast since 2007. In the South and West Texas the poverty rate has grown significantly since the Great Recession began. On the flip side, poverty is significantly lower in both metropolitan areas and rural counties. The spread of poverty in the South and West
