You get a certain photo printing printing app (if you choose) called Photoshop Cloud that's integrated into the application. So you really don't have the option of doing all the adjustments, image quality settings, etc., but can actually see the printing results using the app, which you can view in your on-screen desktop or on a browser. From there, you can print photos, export images to your computer, or even start wirelessly printing photos using a generic multifunction printer. That seems cool. There's also a lot of other options for printing, including: High-definition copy paper: This is what my family has been using, because we have several high-definition digital cameras, and they just don't want to print large pictures. I'm jealous. You can specify which resolution and size you want the printer to print at. The purchaser has to note that the paper has a full bleed option (photos that bleed all the way across the paper), and the print settings are set before sending the file. Whoa – not sure I totally liked how the app remembered settings for me, but I'm using it. The beauty in working Lightroom is that it's so much better than any other imaging application that most people use in the course of their daily work. It will, of course, gather meta keywords and images from the web. You can upload your own images, and there are a wide variety of video-related tools for extracting metadata. After comparing Lightroom versions 4 and 5, I can honestly state that the new version is better. It's improved performance, the organization of tools and adjustments is much better (Option buttons are more versatile, for instance), and one of the things I really like is that the user interface on the Mac version of Lightroom has been updated. It fit my workflow much better, but that's just me.
