New language packs are easy to use for new languages; they are not automatic though (example that they did not show up when I installed the Persian package on my Japanese OS): download and install Jap. restart the PC. Press the windows + Alt keys, and look for the Japanese menu. you should see Japanese Language for all the programs. However, the remaining 4 languages that you would have to install from the official download sites are not worth it. I guess there's simply not enough effort invested to make them possible. And the previous language packs that they have for MS office are old, out of date, and insecure. They have new and more flexible methods of translation at the moment. I'm guessing that MS didn't invest any energy into the Japanese version of office and/or the Japanese language pack. But once again, since the Japanese language packs for office 2013 are not easy to find here, I suggest that you download the German language pack from the standard download sites for office 2013. The German language pack works seamlessly, and you can switch between the original Japanese version, and the translated German one without any extra steps. I like that better. Don't forget to download the German language pack. The Japanese one is much easier to locate. A: C:\WINDOWS\System32\Office16 This is the 64
