As I understand the router we would be able to create components that can inherit a parent component and dynamically display different components, for example: `@Component({ selector: 'app-admin', templateUrl: 'app/admin/admin.component.html' }) export class AdminComponent {} @Component({ selector: 'app-profile', templateUrl: 'app/profile/profile.component.html' }) export class ProfileComponent {}` The aim is that when a user visits /admin he will be able to see the admin component (and everything is fine) and when visiting /profile he will be able to see the profile component. My question is: is it possible to do it without the need to create a router-outlet (and without encapsulation with parent/child components?) The main problem is that we have one component located at the top level and all the others at the lower level (that would imply creating /profile and /admin and would not work out) A: Yes you can. create two components which differ in selector and have separate templateUrl (for example, admin.component.html and profile.component.html) The easiest way to achieve this is to use named router outlets. See this article for more info For example, in your routing config, create the router outlet: `const routes: Routes = [{path: 'admin', component: AdminComponent, outlet: 'admin'}`
