Merge Layers massively increases the number of layers that Photoshop can hold in a file. But, you can have only one layer that is permanently visible at a time during editing. This means that if you choose to "Merge all visible," you will see only one layer at a time. Lightroom has no such limitations. Even if you create a 1,001-layer document and merge it, you won't see more than one layer at a time. This extra level of control means that in many cases, you can now make more layers than you could before. It's all about what you're trying to accomplish at that moment. Lightroom's built-in Organizer is quite versatile; it can do a lot of what Photoshop will do (in some cases), and has a much simpler interface. Also, one of the great strengths of Lightroom is it's simple "Right Click" / "Save to Organizer" function, which is distinctive and easier to use than the other way around. For example, the past couple of versions have included more sophisticated removal options. It used to be necessary to click a face into the hierarchy to remove it. Still a fan of this software. I also have photoshop up and running on my Macbook. The new features i am looking forward to are the new concirpt, built in lens correction and restoration tools. Even though I can edit my files on my PC and mac with Photoshop, I cannot get photoshop to work in the iPhone or iPad OS without jumping back to window 7. Also, I cannot edit images in the app which I do on my pc. Would be neat if photos could be put directly on my ipad and edited within photoshop. Well, back to my last wonder...
