"Following the switch from Final Cut Pro 6 to Final Cut Pro X, support for old QuickTime trailers for YTS, and.3gp video, and the inability to add frames or place markers to an existing sequence, and there being no interface to allow for the selection of keyframes, have all contributed to it not being my first choice for editing or sharing videos. However, with the new release of VideoMix Pro 2, just released on the Mac App Store, the potential has arrived to create a simple, elegant and highly portable solution to the editing of your videos. Indeed, at first glance, I was initially put off by the fact that the work area was no longer being shown in thirds, but that view is now simply being called "Layers", a far more logical term and the one used in the newer versions of FCP 7. Layers view However, as shown in the video below, you can move the "Layers" view back into thirds, if you want, so it can be accessed at any time, in a similar way to how you can do so when working on a track that is being shown in third. Layers view shown in thirds Layers view in thirds can be accessed from the Window menu, or via Shift+W. This can be accessed by the same method in the new "Adaptive" interface, and can be toggled between thirds or floating, and whether you can move the Layers view back and forth between the top, bottom and side of the edit window, or whether you just see it in thirds. Layers view in thirds The adaptive editing is very similar to Final Cut Pro 7's, but has a few small differences that you can see in the interface in the image below, including the "Header" tab that is now in the same place as before, where
