In what amounts to a victory for victims of crime, a judge ordered the 35-year-old man to repay the money to two of his alleged victims. The man, who has only given his name as John Doe, was sentenced in 2010 to probation after pleading guilty to multiple counts of robbery and weapons charges. But Doe ran into some trouble later that year when he was arrested for allegedly breaking into a client's home, stealing cash and forging a judge's signature to get his probation revoked. The case was eventually thrown out by a judge who said there had been "procedural irregularities" in the case. The latest court order, handed down by Ontario's Superior Court of Justice, means Doe can't return to court to challenge his original conviction. The decision also means that the former robber can't apply for any victim restitution order. Doe was ordered to repay $14,000 to the former owner of a Middletown, N.Y., home and $3,000 to the former owner of a Connersville, Ind., home. Both are identified in court documents only as "John Doe." He was found guilty of three separate robberies in his home province — one in 2009, another in December 2010, and the third in June 2011. All three of the crimes carried a lengthy maximum sentence of nine years behind bars, but they only put Doe away for almost five years. The Royal Newfoundland Constabulary, which handled Doe's trial and sentencing, refused to comment Wednesday. A person answering the phone at the former prosecutor's office declined comment. It's not known whether Doe's lawyer was also unable to comment. The woman who owns the home from which $14,000 was stolen said she has decided to put the money towards a trip to New York City. "That's what's important to me," she
