This can allow you to adjust the spacing around different elements or allow you to change the letter spacing on the same element to make it look better. Both programs have tools available to change the spacing within text. In general, a good page design is one that avoids flaring whenever it can. While flare may actually be a pretty good thing on its own, it's often unnecessary. Anyone who has ever made a revolving storefront for instance, knows that, to be effective, it should only be visible when a customer is looking for a particular thing. If you design a piece to look like a facade, you might end up with a lot of flaring. However, achieving clean, uncluttered design is a matter of carefully considering dominant patterns and colors. Correctly applied patterns can emphasize order and organization. A lack of color balance can also direct your patrons in the wrong direction. In areas where a highly visual experience is required, designers often rely on the addition of patterns. These can be made through a photo manipulator. A photo manipulator is a program that can be used in Photoshop or Elements. They can be used to remove a particular area of an image or to change a duplicate area of an image. In the timeline, we can use the Lasso tool to select a window or image to create a selection. We can create a selection, drag it to where we want it, and use it to select a new area, delete an area, swap areas, or intelligently merge about areas. Once the selection is made, we can use the Mixer which is located at the top of the screen to blend between images, and then use the Opacity Mask feature built into the Timeline to create transparent aspects for an image mask.
